

Campaign Transcreation

One campaign line, re-created for six markets — with rationale.

Brief (fictional)

A specialty coffee brand is launching a summer campaign. The English line is short, sensory and aspirational. The brand wants each market to feel the same promise — pleasure and freedom — without a literal translation that would sound flat.

Source line (EN): “Taste the freedom.”

Transcreations

Market	Transcreated line	Rationale
Español	Saborea tu libertad.	“Saborea” adds slow enjoyment; “tu” makes it personal.
Français	Libre comme jamais.	Idiomatic freedom; a literal version would feel flat.
Deutsch	Freiheit, die man schmeckt.	Keeps the sensory promise in natural German word order.
Português	Prove a liberdade.	Short, punchy and ad-ready for the Brazilian market.
Italiano	Assapora la libertà.	“Assaporare” evokes slow, pleasurable tasting.

Tone & craft notes

- Every version keeps the two-beat rhythm of the original for use as a tagline.
- Sensory verbs (saborea, assapora) replace the plain “taste” where it adds warmth.
- No version translates “freedom” mechanically; each chooses the most natural register.
- Each line was checked to fit typical banner and social-post lengths.

Deliverable format

For a real engagement, each market would receive two to three options, a recommended choice, and short usage notes (where the line fits, what to avoid). This sample shows one recommended option per market for clarity.

Fictional demonstration sample created by Scriptorium. The brand, campaign and lines are invented to illustrate transcreation method.

Scriptorium • Languages • Texts • Documentation • scriptorium-language-studio • josuepug@gmail.com